AERIAL MAPPING 1998 (G1525)

Introduction

This project followed on from the pilot mapping project begun in 1995/6 in accordance with the methodologies being developed by RCAHM (W) concentrating on the Meirionnydd area. In 1997 the project focussed on OS quarter sheet SH67SE, in the northern part of the Snowdonia National Park. This year, the work continued on from that area, adding to last years' work and moving eastwards to cover the area between Abergwyngregyn and Llanfairfechan, centred on SH675725.

Methodology

For the purposes of the project, black and white vertical APs at 1:10560 scale taken in the 1940's and 50's were supplied from the Welsh Office. Landscape information from the previous project was used as background detail. The AutoCAD sketch from the 1997 project was used as a basis for plotting, supplementing the existing plots and correcting the positions where necessary. Areas that had not been previously covered were added to the existing sketch.

The 1996-7 project encountered some difficulties with matching the plot with features on the OS background due to the problems with control point in areas of undulating ground. As a result, the methodology was changed slightly to put in reference points field by field where necessary. Although this was time consuming, it saved time later when the sketch layers were transferred into FastCad. The sketch plotting was carried out in a similar manner to the previous projects, covering areas defined by obvious physical boundaries in a logical progression across the quarter sheet.

All man made features were plotted using the colour conventions defined in the RCAHMW manual. The sketch plot was then transferred to Fastcad 2 as a .dxf file and enhanced using RCAHMW black and white oblique prints of the main areas of archaeological interest. Record creation was carried out in Fastmap using the database created for the previous project and the mapped features were assigned to layers by period in line with RCAHMW conventions. The database produced is compatible with the Gwynedd Sites and Monuments Record and the Extended National Database for Wales.

As has been mentioned above, the methodology had to be changed slightly to ensure the accuracy of the sketch plotting and it is essential that the flexibility to do this remains. As has been stated in previous years, the variations in landscape and archaeology from area to area makes it almost impossible to quantify the amount of time needed to cover any given quarter sheet. A number of the problems noted in the 1995-6 project (GAT Report No. 205) have not yet been resolved, principally using the DOS version of Fastmap for record creation. At present, however, it is not clear for how much longer this particular system will be used and many of the problems could be resolved by updating to Fastmap for Windows or by using a different package altogether.

Results

The area covered by the quarter sheet SH67SE has been the subject of fairly detailed survey over the years and a large number of archaeological sites have already been recorded, many of which have since been destroyed by conifer plantation. The Aber and Anafon valleys have been well recorded as has Bwlch y Ddeufaen and access to the entire area is reasonably good. This being the case, the priority of the project was to map recorded sites rather than discover new ones. A second aim was to map field systems and landscape features which show clearly on the Welsh Office verticals taken approximately 50 years ago but are no longer visible on the ground. Having said that, a number of new sites were recorded, including one possible concentric circle enclosure.

The previous year's project recorded sites immediately to the west of the Aber valley and in the area east of Maes y Gaer hillfort. A large number of the sites consisted of the remains of relict field systems, some of which may have been of fairly recent origin. The 1997 area was divided by the steep wooded valley of Nant y Felin-fach. To the west, around Bod-Silin the archaeology consisted mostly of field systems and cultivation ridges some already recorded as being of prehistoric date, others apparently modern. A number of hut circles were mapped in this area, including two enclosed hut groups recorded in the 1996 project. This area also extended south to the Anafon river where a complicated series of trackways were recorded along with cultivation terraces and prehistoric and medieval hut groups.

The area to the east of Nant y Felin-fach comprised a complex, overlapping multi-period landscape dominated by medieval settlement and field systems. The archaeology of this area is relatively well known but had not been mapped in detail previously. Among the previously recorded sites were a group of 4 long huts with associated field system, an enclosed hut group, single hut circles and a prehistoric cairn. New sites included a concentric circle enclosure and a possible hillfort/defended enclosure. Although the eastern area was delimited by the boundary between enclosed fields and the open rough grazing around Garreg Fawr, the field systems continued beyond the modern boundary.

To the south, around the lower slopes of Foel Dduarth, the landscape was open moorland with a coverage of heather and gorse, making the identification of sites difficult. Although previous ground based surveys had identified a number of sites in this area, it was not possible to spot them from the aerial photographs. There were also problems finding control points in this area, due to the steeply sloping ground and lack of field boundaries for reference.

Conclusions

One of the results of the aerial mapping project is to identify areas which would benefit from further survey both aerial and ground based. Certainly, more work could be done on the area between Nant y Felin-fach and Garreg Fawr, as the RCAHMW oblique photographs showed a reasonable degree of survival of archaeological features in this area despite considerable improvement to the land. The continuation of mapping to the east of this area to take in the Garreg Fawr area would also be of great benefit as many of the features could be seen to continue eastwards onto the open land.

The density and complexity of the archaeology in the 1997-8 area created its own problems and challenges but also produced some interesting results. As a result of the two years work, nearly 200 new sites have been added to the record and detailed information has been added to existing records. Working from the 1940s photographs has enabled a picture of the historic landscape of the area to be built up where little or nothing now remains, enabling the surviving archaeology to be better put into context.
