Preface

Natural forces and human activity acting together over the last six thousand years have contributed to produce a landscape of great beauty and variety in Wales, a national asset that is essential both to our national identity and to our individual 'sense of place' and well-being. The diversity and imprint of human activity on the landscape is everywhere to be seen, from the enigmatic stone monuments of the prehistoric period and the magnificent castles and abbeys of the medieval period, to quite commonplace and typical features like field boundaries that can often be of great age. But the landscape is more than just attractive scenery or a record of the past; it also provides a place for us to live, work and sustain ourselves, through farming, forestry, tourism and so on, processes that all shape, and will continue to shape, the landscape.

Recognising and raising awareness of the importance and wealth of the historic fabric of the landscape has been the central theme and message of the non-statutory, Register of Landscapes of Historic Interest in Wales, the first part of which, covering thirty-six 'outstanding' landscapes, was published in January 1998. This is being compiled as a joint initiative between Cadw: Welsh Historic Monuments, the Countryside Council for Wales (CCW) and the International Council on Monuments and Sites (ICOMOS), working in collaboration with the four Welsh Archaeological Trusts, the Royal Commission on the Ancient and Historical Monuments of Wales and the Welsh unitary authorities.

The Historic Landscapes Register provides a first step, a national overview of the historic content of the Welsh landscape. The next step, so essential to the process of informing the way in which aspects of the historic landscape may be managed, is to make available more detailed information about the character of this landscape at a more local level. This is achieved through a process known as historic landscape characterisation which has been developed in Wales jointly by Cadw, the CCW and the Welsh Archaeological Trusts. This involves the identification of geographically definable and mappable areas of historic character, as determined by the range and distribution of surviving archaeological and historical features and the main types of historical land use patterns

This report is one of a series of landscape characterisation exercises being undertaken by the Welsh Archaeological Trusts with grant-aid from Cadw. These studies will initially concentrate on those areas identified on the Historic Landscapes Register, although it is accepted that the whole of the Welsh landscape can be said to be, in one way or another, historic. Information is being prepared in a form which is compatible to the CCW's landscape assessment and decision making methodology, known as LANDMAP. It will be made available to a wide range of organisations and will feed into various initiatives to protect and manage the Welsh countryside, most notably the Tir Gofal agri-environment scheme. It is also seen as making a particularly important contribution to raising awareness and heightening a feeling of local distinctiveness.

The Historic Landscapes Register and these characterisation exercises fully acknowledge the dynamic and evolving nature of the landscape. They promote the view that protecting the legacy of the past in the landscape is not to be achieved by preventing change or fossilising the landscape but rather by informing the process of change, creating tomorrow's landscapes without necessarily sacrificing the best of yesterday's.

Introduction

THE PURPOSE OF THE PRESENT STUDY

This study is a contribution to the overall historic landscape initiative currently being funded by Cadw: Welsh Historic Monuments, the Countryside Council for Wales and ICOMOS UK. Its principal aim is to provide information to aid the management of the historic landscape. The following uses of historic landscape characterization were identified by Cadw:

- Planning, including large-scale intrusions such as roads, windfarms, mineral extraction, large-scale landfill/waste disposal, reclamation, water schemes, major settlement schemes, and major industrial developments
- Landscape management by large corporate landowners, farmers, industrial companies, water and electricity companies, the forestry industry, and the National Trust
- Advice to conservation bodies such as Cadw, the Countryside Council for Wales, the Environment Agency, local authorities, national parks
- Local landscape conservation initiatives and management agreements by Cadw, Countryside Council for Wales, local authorities
- To enhance our understanding of the historic aspects of landscape, stimulating further research, raising public perception of the landscape, and the preparation of policy statements by public bodies

EVOLVING HISTORIC LANDSCAPE CHARACTERIZATION METHODOLOGY

Historic landscape characterization is a contribution towards the overall historic landscape initiative currently being funded by Cadw: Welsh Historic Monuments, Cadw: Welsh Historic Monuments, the Countryside Council for Wales and ICOMOS UK. Its principal aim is to provide information to aid the management of the historic environment.

Historical landscape characteristics are the tangible evidence of the activities and habits of the people who occupied, developed, used and shaped the land to serve human needs in the past; they reflect the beliefs, attitudes, traditions and values of these people. They include the physical remains of all aspects of human activities and the exploitation in the past (above and below ground, known and potential), and our understanding, interpretation and even perception of those remains. They may reflect a variety of activities occurring at one time, or evolving functions in different periods of time.

The Countryside Commission (in its document Views from the Past, 1996) states that as managers we should be concerned with the historic character of the present landscape, and not with the study of the past for its own sake. It places the idea of 'historic landscape character' at the centre of these ideas. Characterization is defined as the process of identifying and defining the particular characteristics which make each area distinctive, and is rapidly emerging as the basis for describing and understanding the environment. Historic landscape characterization is one dimension of this approach: it sets out to identify the principal historic components within the current landscape. It is the great depth of human activity which underpins much of that which we feel is important and helps to give an idea of its local distinctiveness.

The term 'historic character' is generally preferred to 'historic landscape', as it is now accepted that all landscape is historic in that it reflects, to a greater or lesser degree, the processes which have occurred in history and which have formed its present appearance.

At present there is no standard, accepted methodology for establishing the historical characterization of landscape, but recent work on Llyn and elsewhere in Wales has suggested a practical approach based on considering the evidence as a series of themes which may provide an answer. At a landscape level, what is significant in historical terms includes field boundary patterns (whether they are irregular or regular, their size, their date etc); settlement patterns (whether they are scattered, nucleated, their date of origin etc); the relict remains of earlier periods which are to be found in upland or marginal landscapes; the effect of 18th- and 19th-century estates on the landscape; the impact of industry, military installations and so on.

The dominant historic themes or patterns in a locality help define local historic character. The combination of these characteristics give an area its local distinctiveness, and it is the definition of areas of local distinctiveness which leads to the definition of 'character areas'.

The concept of 'character areas' differs somewhat from comparable studies in England, such as the Cotswold AONB, which are based on 'historic landscape types', where the predominant form of the present landscape is identified principally by the existing patterns of enclosures within areas of landscape.

The process of characterization adopted here can be summarised as follows:

one or more dominant patterns	→	coherent character
coherent character with definable limits	→	character area
one or more character areas	→	historic landscape area

Characterization is a practical tool intended to aid management in its broadest forms. In order to be of any practical use, this has to be translated into the management of 'landscape tangibles' (ie the evidence for historical processes and periods in the present landscape). It is essential, therefore, that the key historic landscape characteristics are features and/or patterns to which can be applied management prescriptions whose success or otherwise can be measured for monitoring purposes.

The reports emanating from this work contain a number of elements: the description of each character area split into three parts — historical background, key historic landscape characteristics, and key historic landscape management issues — accompanied by a map and a photograph. The historical background provides a straightforward description of the archaeological and historical development of the area. The section on key historic landscape characteristics lists the principal characteristics which make that area distinctive and which future management should therefore concentrate on. The section on key historic landscape management issues begins to define the scope for creative action within a number of initiatives (including LANDMAP, Unitary Development Plans, and Tir Gofal, the all-Wales agri-environment scheme) which can sustain or even enhance elements considered essential to the historic character of the areas.

MANAGING HISTORIC CHARACTER

Rural land-use change

There have been many pressures on the rural environment and the countryside over the last 50 years as a result of changes in land use and shifting priorities for agriculture (the principal rural land use). Agricultural intensification and the maximisation of productivity were the priorities up until the mid-1980s, and as a consequence the character of rural landscapes changed dramatically during this period as hedgerows and trees were removed to create more efficient farming systems. Reclamation of the hills and marginal land led to the removal of significant upstanding archaeological sites and palimpsest landscapes.

Currently, due to agricultural overproduction and a general greater awareness of and concern for the quality and protection of the rural environment, the implementation of the Common Agricultural Policy provides a number of incentives to farmers and landowners to manage their land in an environmentally sensitive manner. The range of such agri-environment schemes (such as Environmentally Sensitive Areas and Tir Cymen) include provision for the conservation of certain habitats as well as for the protection and enhancement of stone walls and boundaries, although the protection of archaeological sites strictu sensu is less of a priority for the schemes. It is expected that this aspect of rural management will be enhanced by the new Tir Gofal scheme.

However, the present schemes do not cover the whole country (as the Tir Gofal scheme is intended to), and even where they do apply not all farmers take them up for various reasons, and so many important archaeological sites and landscape features continue to be lost. The challenge, therefore, is to identify historic landscape priorities for conservation, protection, enhancement or even restoration. The next step will be to ensure delivery of sound historical landscape management via a number of management initiatives and strategies.

Two of the principal advantages of an approach using character areas are that firstly it is able to identify and map both local distinctiveness and national importance; and secondly, by identifying physical features which can be managed it can feed directly into land management and development planning strategies. It can assist in management plans by setting priorities for management and enhancement, highlighting intrinsic values, and encouraging links to multipurpose management.

Characterization is about management: if we are going to manage effectively, we must know what is there, what is important and what we want to do with it. Character areas can tell us what is distinctive (ie important both locally and nationally) about a particular area, and therefore what needs to be managed in order to retain that area's distinctiveness (character).

General considerations

Positive management should be aimed at halting and, if necessary, reversing any trends that can be shown to be causing unacceptable damage to the historic landscape resource. If at the same time management can actually enhance the historic landscape, then that is even better. It is essential that such management is continuous, and contains provisions for monitoring and review.

One of the basic tenets underpinning management is that we should be aiming to continue (rather than halt) the past evolution of the landscape: to do this we must first identify what is important and significant in historic landscape terms. It is the overall historic character of the present landscape (as evidenced in important and significant groupings and patterns) which we should aim to retain, but in order to do this we must concentrate management actions at the level of individual components. We must identify, conserve and enhance the local and regional historic diversity of our landscapes.

Agri-environment and other rural initiatives offer the opportunity to integrate the needs of the historic environment with modern land-use requirements to produce a workable, effective management system. More importantly, they should result in a working, viable landscape, which should provide ways and means for the various human activities in an area to be integrated with each other and with conservation, at the same time providing opportunities for study, research, education, interpretation and quiet enjoyment.

This means that sites and features of historic landscape interest are positively managed for their own sake, rather than just left unimproved. It is important that the management of such features is integral to the management of the farm, or the scheme, as a whole, rather than an isolated, unrelated activity.

By working at the most basic level, management can be used to retain the general historic character of the area management of components → retain character → conserve diversity boundaries, buildings, and character areas

 archaeological sites etc

A management plan should specify conservation objectives for a site/area and how they will be monitored: it should identify points at which some response will be made if monitoring shows that a feature is changing; it should establish what activities/processes will be the subject of monitoring; it should establish what management of on-going activities is required; and identify the types of development or activities which might adversely affect the site.

Not all the sites and features which comprise the historic environment require the same detailed level of management: some sites can be adequately managed by the application of simple, general strategies, while more complex sites merit more detailed, site-specific, problem-led responses.

General mechanisms

It is envisaged that characterization has many potential applications to management including the following:

- assisting in developing landscape conservation and enhancement projects, by identifying elements and patterns of the historic environment which are considered either typical of a local area (provide local distinctiveness) or are of particular importance (rare at a national level)
- targeting resources within grant-aid by government and other organisations towards conserving elements and patterns of the historic environment in the same way
- developing policies for unitary development plans
- assisting in determining planning applications, especially large-scale developments such as roads, windfarms, mineral extraction, large-scale landfill, waste disposal, reclamation, water schemes, major settlement and major industrial development
- aiding the management of land by farmers, and large corporate landowners such as industrial companies, water or electricity companies, the forestry industry and the National Trust
- providing baseline information for local areas against which future change can be monitored, for example as part of the new Tir Gofal scheme
- providing general information not already on the SMR which can be used to inform advice given as part of a number of rural initiatives such as Tir Gofal, Woodland Grant Schemes etc
- providing advice in a rural framework to conservation agencies including Cadw, Countryside Council for Wales, Environment Agency, local authorities, national parks and others

- providing information to a number of wider initiatives, including contributing to our academic understanding of landscape, stimulating further research, raising public perception of the landscape, and the preparation of policy statements by public bodies

Specific mechanisms

Tir Gofal, which has recently been launched, will be open to applications from farmers throughout Wales. Within the scheme, payments will be made to farmers for observing ‘codes of good environmental practice’, one of which is care and enhancement of the historic environment. As the scheme is a ‘whole farm’ scheme, it will allow archaeological management strategies sensitive to the character of the landscape as a whole to be integrated with farming practices. Characterization is useful for monitoring purposes, as it sets out the wider historic environment framework within which individual farm plans will sit. It can also help prioritise management within a broader landscape context.

Unitary Development Plans address ‘land use’ issues and are currently being compiled by unitary authorities in Wales and England.

Countryside strategies are the responsibility of local authorities (together with others), which have a general duty under section 1 of the Countryside Act, 1981, to have regard to the desirability of conserving the natural beauty and amenity of the countryside in the exercise of their functions relating to land. Countryside strategies principally address management of the countryside in areas outside settlement limits, but they are also a mechanism, at least in part, of implementing development plan policies. In Wales, such strategies are supported by the Countryside Council for Wales.

Local authorities have a number of powers which have implications for the management of the historic environment including the power to establish Country Parks (section 7 of the Countryside Act 1968); the ability to declare Local Nature Reserves (section 21 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949); the ability to enter into access agreements with landowners (section 64 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949); the ability to buy derelict land (often of industrial archaeological interest) for reclamation purposes (section 21 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949); the duty to make Tree Preservation Orders where appropriate (section 198 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990); and the duty to apply The Hedgerow Regulations 1997 which controls the removal of certain important hedgerows (from section 97 of the Environment Act 1995). Other powers are treated separately below.

Local Agenda 21 programme At Rio, governments committed themselves to setting up national targets for safeguarding and improving the environment. Local Agenda 21 and Local Biodiversity Action Plans provide the means of meeting these targets, and of promoting the principles of sustainable development, at a local level. Both initiatives are about embracing a conscientious vision of the long-term future by identifying what matters locally and paying serious attention to the global costs of maintaining local lifestyles.

This has implications for archaeology and the historic environment. At a local level, sense of place is a fundamental aspect of quality of life. The present day landscape underpins our sense of the place in which we live. Much of its character and distinctiveness is derived from the historic environment (archaeology and the built heritage in all its forms). The historic environment is of course both fragile and non-renewable. We have a responsibility to maintain it so that future generations can also appreciate and benefit from it in the same way that we do. However, the landscape is not static. Just as today’s landscape is a product of the changing relationships between people and their environment through time, so it must be allowed to continue to change.

The point of sustainability is that it promotes change which meets the needs of the future whilst retaining the integrity of the historic environment. In order to do so decisions have to be made about the relative importance of different elements. Traditionally, evaluation has been based on individual sites, with particular examples being selected out for special protection (known as scheduling). However, it is the sum total of archaeological features not individual sites which give landscape its grain and it is often the more ordinary features that create 'local distinctiveness'. In order to ensure that decisions about the future of the historic environment are made on a secure basis, sound information needs to be gathered. Historic landscape characterization work of the kind being carried out by the Welsh Archaeological Trusts provides historic environment audits, from which decisions of this kind can be made.

Biodiversity Action Plans Local Biodiversity Action Plans (LBAPs) are a means by which Local Government Authorities can implement the biodiversity recommendations established after the Rio Summit. They achieve this by building up local partnerships and taking account of both national and local biodiversity priorities to develop strategies for the conservation of species and habitats of local significance. As we are still at the early stages of our involvement, more information will be forthcoming at a later date, but it is already obvious that the type of general information coming from characterization projects will be able to feed into such plans.

At a general level, archaeology is of relevance to LBAPs because it raises awareness of the historical origins of the contemporary environment. There are no purely 'natural' environments in Britain; the landscape is the product of millennia of human activity. Our knowledge of the changing relationship between people and their environment through history allows us to understand the land-use activities which have led to the creation of contemporary landscapes, and comment from an informed historical perspective on those practices which could be encouraged in order to protect and conserve particular landscapes and ecosystems.

Access is a key issue in the countryside, if we are to enjoy the landscape and all its inherent interests and in turn engender understanding and respect for the countryside and the way it works. In addition to the rights of way network, the government has recently announced proposals to provide greater access to open areas of the countryside and issued a Framework for Action. As many of the best-preserved and most fragile palimpsest archaeological sites and landscapes lie within these areas, this has potential implications for archaeological management.

Historic landscape characterization can identify these areas (ie where there are well-preserved yet fragile archaeological remains) and thus highlight the potential management problems if the areas are 'opened up' to public access. It may even be that such areas could be excluded from unfettered access under new legislation, either permanently or on a temporary basis.

Characterization also has the potential to inform leaflets, trails and other interpretative material.

Leisure strategy Historic landscape characterization may have a bearing on local authority leisure strategies.

Tourism The Tourist Board for Wales has the strategic responsibility for encouraging people to visit Wales and for the provision of tourist facilities. In recent years tourism has become one of the most important growth sectors of the economy. Unitary authorities all have a tourism strategy of some description, and historic characterization has a part to play in sustainable 'green tourism' in that it can help identify local distinctiveness which can be used both to attract visitors (by way of advertising), create atmosphere and to inform quality initiatives such as local walks, guides and other recreational activities. It can also direct visitors to areas with a robust historic environment, and away from those which are particularly fragile.

Management agreements In addition, local authorities have the ability (under section 39 of the Wildlife & Countryside Act, 1998) to enter into management agreements with landowners. This is an area which could be explored further from the historic environment perspective, as such agreements could cover not only individual monuments but also historic landscape characteristics (such as boundary types).

Other local authority programmes Local authorities have programmes for economic development, highways maintenance, environmental education and coastal protection. These would all benefit from the information which is being compiled through the characterization projects, and, in the other direction, the safeguarding of the historic environment would benefit from those drawing up these programmes having direct access to historic landscape characterization data. In fact, information at this broad level would probably be more useful than detailed, site-specific SMR data.

Forestry Commission Information from characterization projects will be invaluable in contributing to new national and regional indicative forestry strategies, indicating where new proposals for planting are likely to be acceptable (or unacceptable) from an historic environment perspective. On a day to day basis, it can provide information at a landscape level which can inform proposals for new planting. It will be particularly useful when considering proposals under any of the challenge schemes.

Environment Agency is responsible for producing Local Environment Action Plans (LEAPs) and Catchment Management Plans (CMPs). The historic environment does not have a high profile in either of these, and both could therefore benefit from information which characterization can provide.

Other bodies Historic landscape characterization information can be used to educate and inform a wide range of organisations and individuals including statutory agencies, voluntary bodies (RSPB, Woodland Trust, Wildlife Trusts, British Trust for Conservation Volunteers, National Trust) town councils, community councils, farming unions and others. It is our experience that often it is easier to explain the importance of, and inherent interest of, the historic environment by using historic characterization, than by the more traditional means of individual archaeological sites and excavations.

Local distinctiveness and a sense of place, which are of undoubted interest to people, can all be conveyed by such means, and the potential importance of this aspect of characterization cannot be emphasised too strongly.

SUMMARY OF WORK CARRIED OUT AS PART OF THE PRESENT STUDY

Of importance to the study was the Sites and Monuments Record (SMR) maintained by CPAT, from which a project database was created. Desk-based studies were undertaken to the capture of additional landscape information not held in the SMR. Of particular importance here were, firstly, Bryn Ellis's The History of Halkyn, published in 1998, and subtitled the mountain with lead in its veins, which contains much background information, and secondly Cambell and Haines's technical report entitled Deeside (North Wales) Thematic Geological Mapping, published by the Geological Survey in 1988, which maps many elements of the mining landscape of Halkyn Mountain. A review was made of the available historic cartography for the area, including tithe maps, enclosure awards, estate maps and published Ordnance Survey maps, notably the 1st edition of the 6-inch map. Graphical data was collected from these sources, particularly relating to the history of industrial activity. During the project 4,883 new records were created relating to the historic landscape of Halkyn Mountain.

Summary

The Holywell Common and Halkyn Mountain historic landscape is above all else a mining landscape of the 18th and 19th centuries, and is considered to form a single character area (1081). Other elements of the landscape which are considered below include the natural landscape, the administrative areas, settlements, agriculture, transport and communications, defensive and military works, and funerary, ecclesiastical and ornamental landscapes

The conjoining uplands of Halkyn Mountain and Holywell Common form an elongated plateau to the east of the Clwydian Hills, separated from them by the Wheeler valley, and overlooking the north east coastal strip of Flintshire and the estuary of the River Dee beyond. The area is about 250m above OD with small local summits protruding no more than 20m above this. The landscape so defined comprises the most important lead and zinc ore field in Wales, and is geologically part of the Carboniferous Limestone belt which runs south from Prestatyn in the north, to Hope Mountain and the northern side of the Bala fault in the south.

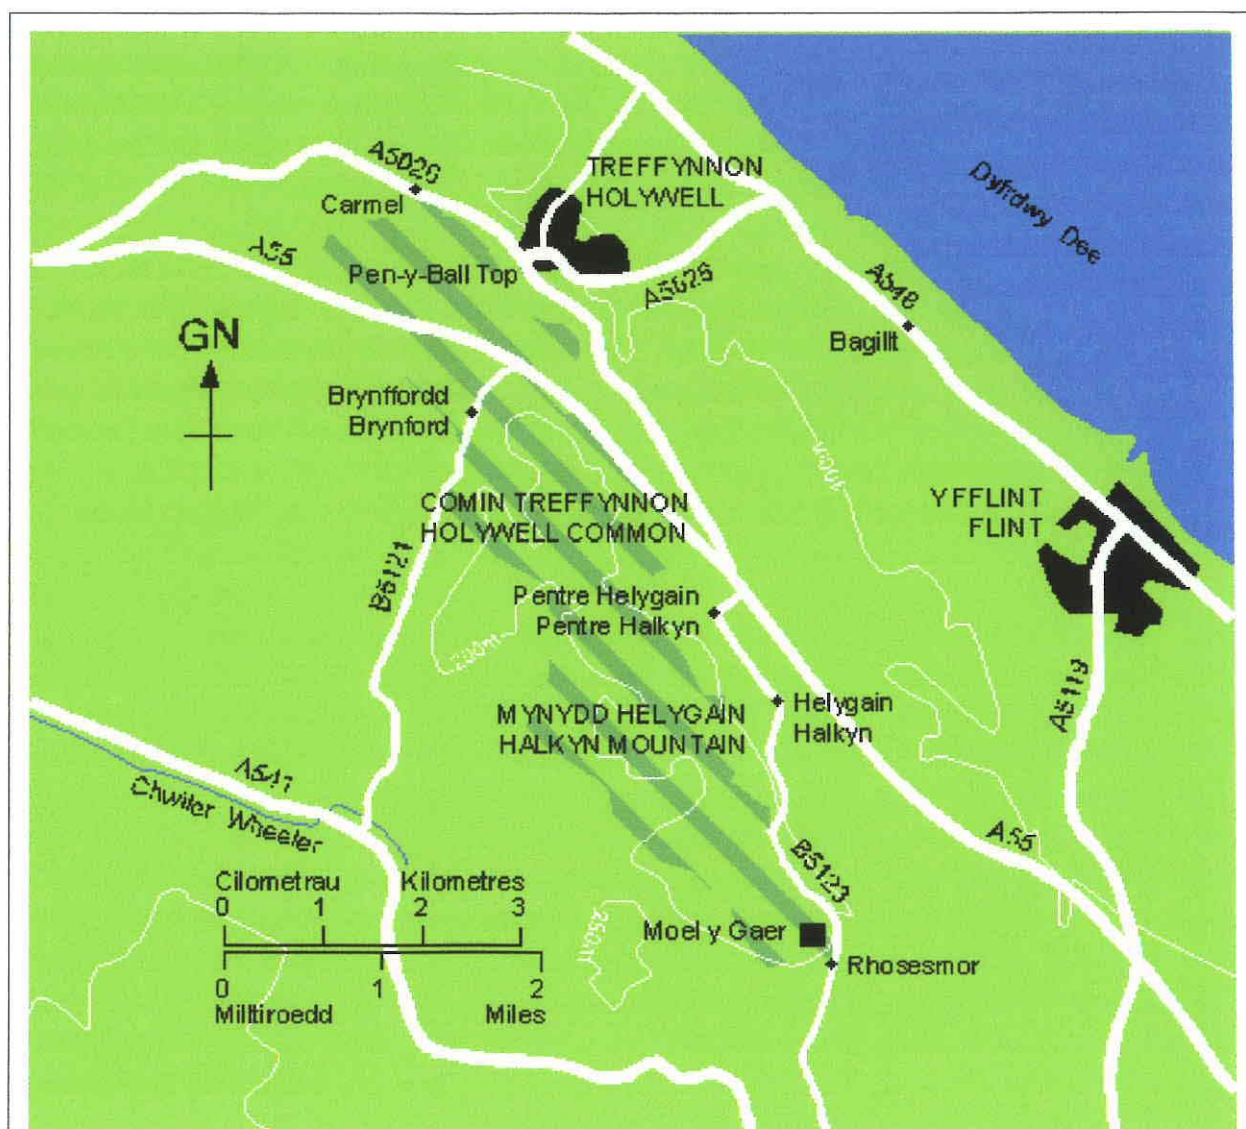

Working is assumed to have started in Roman times because of the discovery of Roman remains associated with the production of lead, outside the area, at Pentre near Flint. Medieval mining is also attested from documentary sources, but 19th century mining has obliterated any traces of earlier workings. The area therefore bears valuable archaeological evidence of one of the oldest industries in Flintshire.

The Quaker Company was instrumental in pioneering lead mining in the county from the late 17th to late 18th centuries, and there is documentary evidence of improvements in technology that allowed deeper shafts to be driven and the location of richer veins. The richest veins were worked intensely throughout the 18th and 19th centuries in the areas now referred to as Halkyn Mountain, Holywell Common and Pen-y-Ball Top, and in 1850, 11,500 tons of lead were produced amounting to about 12% of the British total. However, mining declined at the end of the 19th century in the face of cheaper imported lead, and there was only small-scale, intermittent activity following the First World War until the remaining mines closed in the 1960s.

The ore field landscape is very distinctive, generally devoid of vegetation and now forms common land returned to rough pasture. Although most of the standing structures associated with the mining have now been lost, the landscape itself, comprising an extensive myriad of craters and tips of no great size, remains remarkably intact and is particularly apparent from the air. A recent survey in the area has recorded in excess of 250 mine sites.

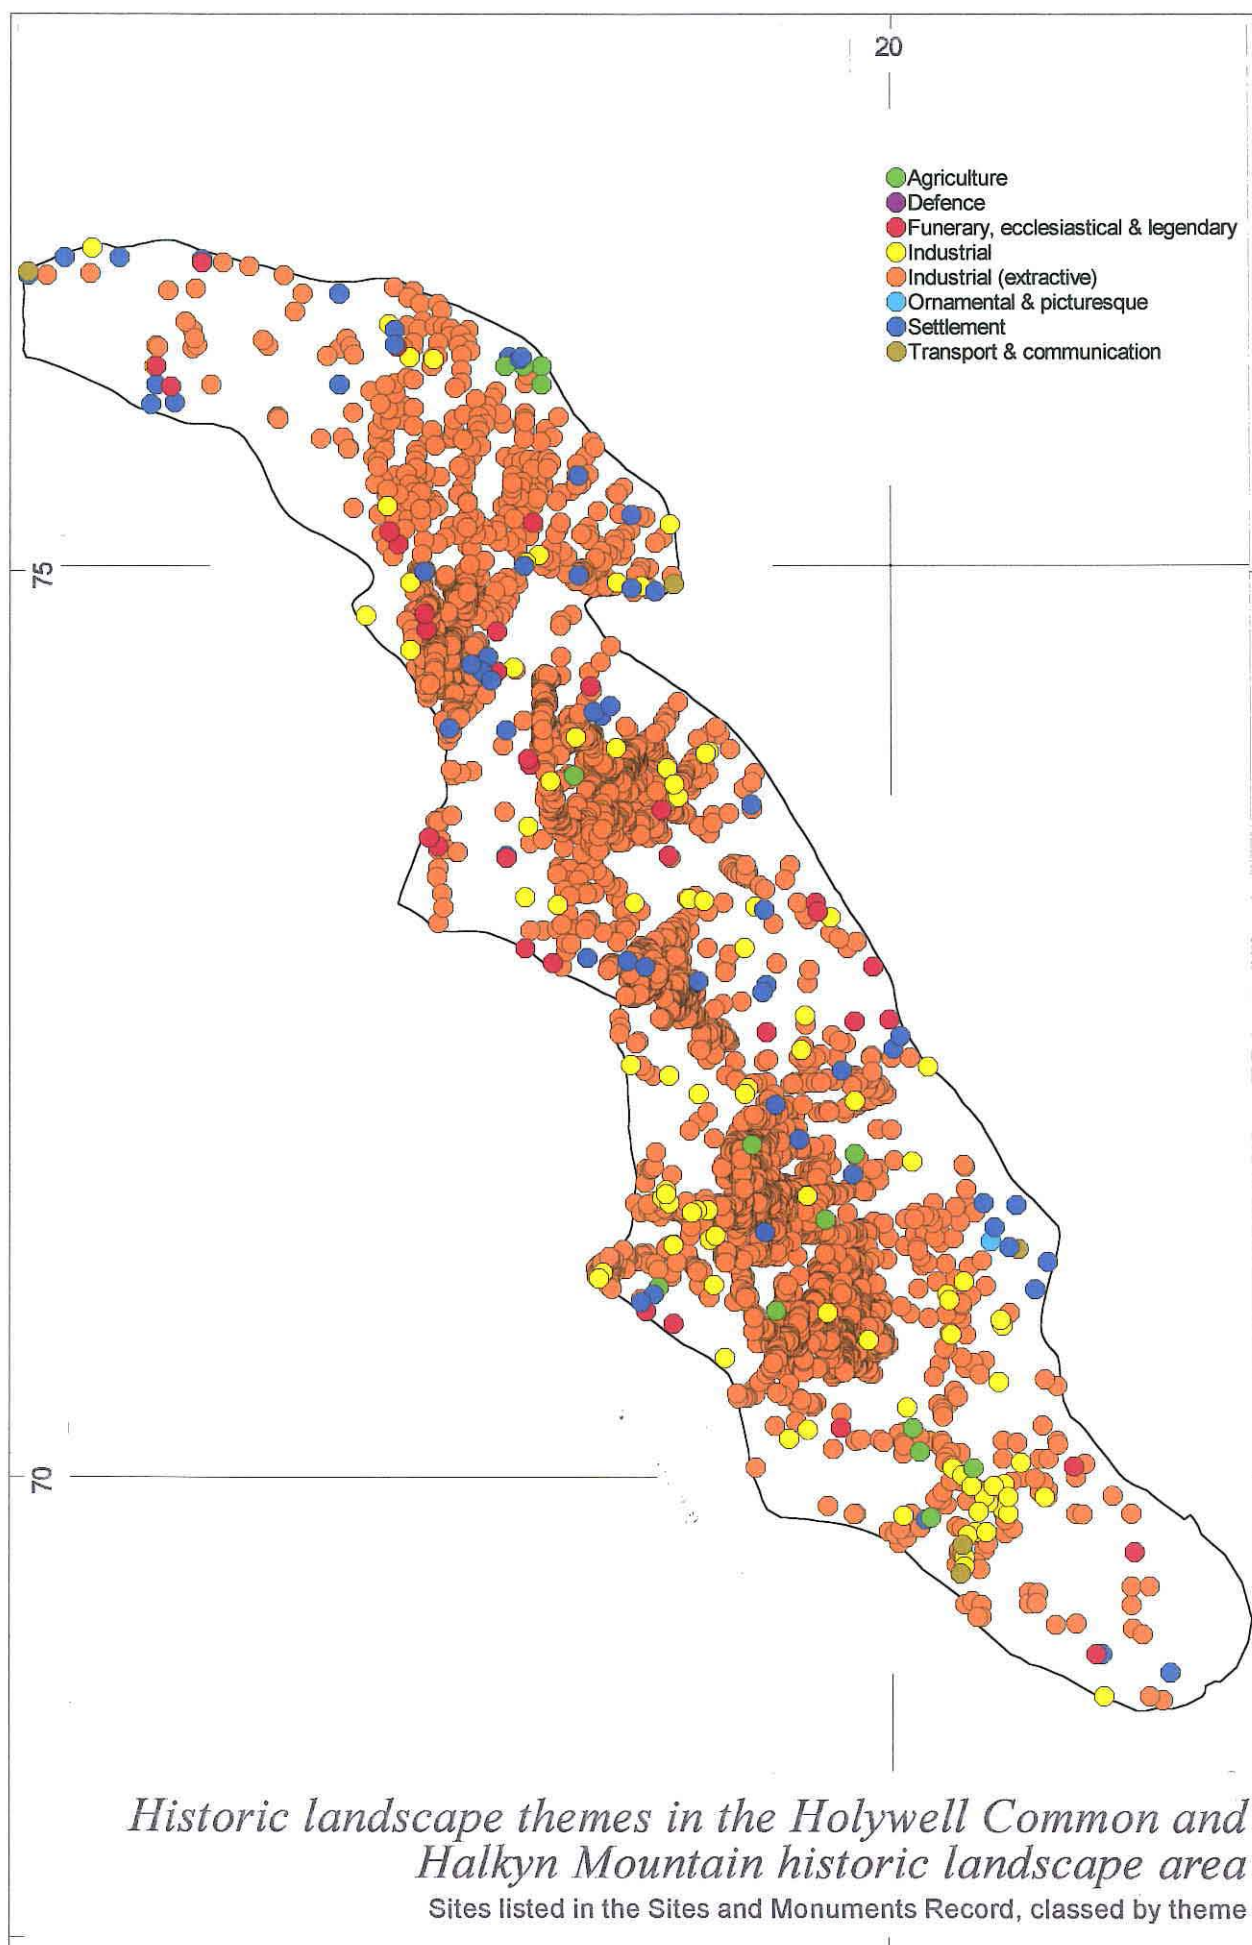

In the undeveloped areas, particularly Halkyn Mountain, the historical significance and value of the landscape is, therefore, in the workings themselves. The archaeological evidence consists mainly of shallow workings or deeper stone-lined shafts, although several horse whim circles can also be identified. They bear evidence of the richness of the veins like Pant-y-gof, Pant-y-ffrith, Pant-y-pydew and Union Vein, where activity was centred on winning and removing the ores rather than dressing them on site. Of the larger mines, earthwork evidence remains of leats and reservoirs, some still holding water, which would have served the dressing floor areas. Where they have survived, small terraces of houses and mine offices have been converted to modern dwellings.

Unrelated to the mining remains, but of industrial archaeological interest, Waen Brodlas in the south of Holywell Common is noted for structural remains and documentary evidence of a significant number of 19th century limekilns. Also unrelated to the mining remains, but included in the area, is the Iron Age hillfort of Moel y Gaer, Rhosesmor, sited on the summit of the isolated hill at south end of Halkyn Mountain. Extensive excavations on the site in 1972-74 before the construction of the covered reservoir, revealed evidence of the construction of the defences and of a remarkable succession of timber-built dwellings occupying the interior.

Holywell Common and Halkyn Mountain

Whitford, Holywell, Brynford and Halkyn Communities, Flintshire

The Holywell Common and Halkyn Mountain historic landscape is above all else a mining landscape of the 18th and 19th centuries, and is considered to form a single character area (1081). The area forms an upland limestone plateau situated between the Clwydian Hills and the Dee estuary in north Flintshire, with extensive and highly distinctive relict 18th and 19th centuries, and possibly earlier, lead mining remains, associated features and settlements, unparalleled elsewhere in Wales.

The Natural Landscape

Holywell Common and Halkyn Mountain is an elongated plateau of Carboniferous Limestone with chert beds, bounded on the east by millstone grit, which overlooks the coastal strip along the Dee estuary to the north and east, and ranging in height between about 165–290m above Ordnance Datum. The present-day landscape is predominantly one of grassland, with few trees and extensive areas of gorse and bracken.

The administrative landscape

During the later prehistoric period the area fell within the tribal area of the Deceangli, whose territory probably extended from the river on the east to the river Conwy on the west. The area had probably been conquered by the Romans by AD 60. By the mid 60s smelted lead was already being exported from the area by private lessees, although probably by the next decade the industry came under Roman imperial control. The region appears to have remained an important industrial area until the 3rd century or possibly beyond.

By perhaps the later 8th century the area came under the influence of the expanding Anglo-Saxon kingdom of Mercia, lying partly between the Whitford Dyke to the west and Wat's Dyke which runs along the eastern side of Halkyn Mountain, taking in the coastal lowlands between Basingwerk and Flint. The area continued to be fought over by the emerging kingdoms of Wales and England for several centuries. By the time the Domesday Book was compiled in 1086 Halkyn Mountain fell within district of Englefeld (Englefield, Tegeingl), which formed part of Atiscros hundred in the county of Cheshire. By the 13th century Tegeingl, together with the cantrefs of Rhos, Rhufoniog and Dyffryn Clwyd formed Perfeddwlad ('middle country'), the Welsh kingdom of Gwynedd Is-Conwy ('Gwynedd below the Conwy').

The area was overrun by Norman marcher lords and English kings on various occasions between the later 11th and early 13th centuries until it was finally conquered by Edward I in the 1270s and 1280s. Tegeingl was retained as part of the king's private possession, becoming the hundred of Coleshill in the new county of Flint created in 1284.

Settlement landscapes

A possible early Neolithic timber long-house on the summit of Moel y Gaer, Rhosesmor, dated to the 3rd millennium BC, may represent the earliest human settlement in the area. Little is known about later prehistoric or Roman settlement in the area, apart from the later prehistoric hillfort at Moel y Gaer, Rhosesmor, considered below in the section on defended landscapes. Other possible settlement sites of early date include an earthwork enclosure on Holywell golf course, to the east of Calcoed, and several possible round hut sites on Bryn-Sannan, to the east of Brynford. A number of early settlements or habitations are recorded in the area in the Domesday Book of 1086, including those at Brynford (Brunford/Brunfor) and Halkyn (Helchene/Alchene), the latter with a church, though there are no known surface traces of settlements at this period.

The modern settlement pattern has clearly been heavily influenced by the mining and quarrying industries. 18th to early 19th-century maps of the present-day settlements at Gorsedd, Brynford, Pentre Halkyn and Rhes-y-cae show only scattered houses and a number of small encroachments on the edge of the common, represented by 18th and early 19th-century stone-built miners' cottages and small farmhouses largely around the margins of the common. The place-name Rhes-y-cae or 'row in a field' refers to a row of houses, a map of the first half of the 18th century showing only the present inn, on the road from Northop to Denbigh.

Conflicts inevitably arose between the established farmers and landowners and those setting up new houses and enclosures on the mountain, and there were concerted campaigns in the 1780s to break down the fences of illegal enclosures by the legitimate commoners and the agents of the Grosvenor estate.

A considerable increase in population took place during the later 17th and later 18th centuries following the rapid expansion of the mining industry, a substantial proportion of the incomers being Derbyshire miners and their families, and it is to this date that most of the nucleated settlements in the area belong.

The village of Halkyn is practically the only old and established nucleated settlement in the area. Originally centred on its medieval church, it was radically remodelled in the 1820s by the Grosvenor family, by realigning the road, moving the church, and placing their new residence, Halkyn Castle, in the area formerly occupied by the heart of the old village. Schools were built in the area at Halkyn in 1849, Brynford in 1852–54, Carmel in 1862 (where the building is now used as a village hall), and at Rhes-y-cae in 1889.

An earlier horizon of timber-framed buildings is represented at The Grange and the Old Farmhouse nearby, the earlier house at The Grange, belonging to Basingwerk Abbey before the dissolution, being a late 15th or 16th-century timber-framed hall with later stone additions, now used as outbuildings. Of the larger houses in the area, Henblas is a stone-built building dated to 1651, and Halkyn Hall is an early brick-built house, dated to 1674, with some earlier elements.

Agricultural landscapes

Present-day land-use is primarily rough grazing. There is little evidence of early cultivation in the area, though the Domesday Book of 1086 refers ploughlands at Brynford (Brunford). There were still extensive areas of woodland at Brynford at that period, however, the Domesday Book again referring to woodland 1 league long (up to one and a half miles) and 2 acres wide. Considerable inroads into the forests were probably made throughout the course of the middle ages in support of the mining and smelting industry, and by the late 18th century most of the area was unenclosed common. Parts of the commons were enclosed by piecemeal individual encroachments during the course of the 18th and 19th centuries, enclosure awards also being granted for more consolidated blocks of land around the margins of the commons in the parishes of Ysgeifiog and Whitford in the first decade of the 19th century. Most of the area has probably been used for grazing since the middle ages, a number of sheepfolds, some of which still survive, being marked on Ordnance Survey maps of the 1880s, as at Moel-y-crio, Pant-y-go, Rhes-y-cae, Billins and Pwll-clai. Few other agricultural structures are recorded, apart from a corbelled pigsty, Peacock Farm, Rhes-y-cae.

Transport and communication

A Roman road may have been built along Halkyn Mountain as part of a route between Roman settlements at Chester and St Asaph, and possibly to provide early access to the mines, though the existing archaeological evidence is inconclusive.

The common land is crisscrossed by numerous trackways and footpaths running between the shafts and mining setts, some of which are first recorded on early maps and plans of the 18th and early 19th centuries. Some of the tracks are likely to be of considerable antiquity, giving access to the mines and to providing communication between communities on either side of the hill. The open mountain was also crossed by a number of longer-distance routes shown on 17th and 18th-century road maps, including a north-south route between Shrewsbury and Holywell, passing through Windmill, a route between Northop and Denbigh via Rhes-y-cae, and a route between Flint and Denbigh via Pentre Halkyn and Waen-brodias.

In earlier times much of the ore mined on Halkyn Mountain would have been carried away by packhorse or by cart to the smelteries, though in the 18th century tramways or narrow-gauge railways were introduced, with trucks pulled by horse or pushed by hand, the course of which can still be seen at Berth-ddu, to the south of Halkyn, for example. Underground canals were constructed in some of the larger mines in the 18th-century, being replaced by underground railways in the 19th century.

During the course of the Napoleonic Wars at the end of the 18th century and the beginning of the 19th century a timber tower for beacon was built within the prehistoric hillfort at Moel y Gaer, Rhosesmor, as part of a long-distance communications network between Holyhead and Chester.

Industrial landscapes

Halkyn Mountain was once one of the most important lead and zinc orefield in Wales. It includes an area of almost continuous mineral workings which runs for about 9km from Gorsedd on the north-west to Rhosesmor on the south-east, via Brynford, Pentre Halkyn, Rhes-y-cae and Halkyn. It is principally known for its lead mines but numerous small limestone, chert, clay and sand quarries are scattered throughout the landscape, together with the large modern stone limestone and chert quarries at Bryn Mawr, Pen yr Henblas and Pant-y-pwll-dwr.

The principal metal ore is galena (lead sulphide), together with sphalerite (zinc sulphide) and minor quantities of chalcopryite (copper, iron sulphide), the principal product being lead, with silver as a valuable by-product. The ores were mostly confined to thin veins, having precipitated in pre-existing faults within the Carboniferous Limestone, the veins in historical times having names such as Long Rake, Old Rake, Chwarel Las, Pant-y-pydw, Pant-y-pwll-dwr veins and the Pant-y-ffrith and Caleb Bell cross-courses,

Despite the lack of certain evidence, it seems likely that the mining of metal ores in the area began in the Bronze Age, the earliest workings probably being relatively shallow surface workings, or bell-pits or open-cuts along the line of a vein of ore. Direct evidence of mining is again lacking for the Iron Age periods, though copper vessels possibly of this date are said to have been found in the mid-18th century in sinking a shaft on Long Rake, Halkyn, an ore vein that runs east to west across the common, cutting through Rhes-y-cae. There is more certain evidence of mining for lead and silver following the Roman conquest, although evidence for the location of mining sites is again lacking. A Roman 'pig' or ingot of lead was found in 1950 during the construction of Carmel School inscribed with the letters C NIPI ASCANI, standing for the name of a private lead producer, C. Nipius Ascanius, the lead undoubtedly having been mined and smelted on Halkyn Mountain. Similar pigs have been found near the Roman legionary fortress at Chester, two of which are inscribed with the letters DECEANGL, the name of the tribe which inhabited north-east Wales. Excavations in the Pentre Oakenholt area of Flint have provided evidence of lead smelting, presumably from ores brought down from Halkyn Mountain. The remains of Roman domestic buildings and a bathhouse at Pentre Farm, Flint were probably the house of a Roman official responsible for supervising this industry, which exported lead along the Dee estuary to Chester and beyond.

Mining was still being carried out on a significant scale during the middle ages, perhaps peaking in the later 13th century when lead was in demand for roofing the newly constructed Edwardian castles at Flint and Rhuddlan as well as those further afield, in Caernarvonshire, Anglesey, and in mid Wales. Records survive from the 1350s of the codes of law and privileges of the free miners of Englefield, which encompassed the Holywell-Halkyn area. Miners were given a plot of land sufficient for a house and garden, and enough wood to repair their house or fences and to make props for their pits. They were free men, who could pasture their stock on common land, sell their ore on the free market, providing they paid their dues to the lord, who owned the mineral rights. Much of the field evidence for medieval and earlier workings has probably been destroyed or obscured by the more intensive workings which began in the 17th century, mines of all periods being largely restricted to the narrow ore veins marked by lines of shafts, bell-pits and trial pits, generally no more than about 4–5m in diameter.

In the 1630s the crown granted the rights to mine lead in the parish of Holywell, in the hundreds of Coleshill and Rhuddlan, to the Grosvenor estate, retaining for itself the rights in Halkyn and Northop. At this early date leases were let as annual bargains, measured in terms of a meer of 30 yards. The lack of investment that this engendered early on was one of the causes of the lines of relatively shallow pits that are such a characteristic feature of the landscape of Holywell Common and Halkyn Mountain.

The London Lead Company, or the Quaker Company as it is more commonly known, was actively mining in Flintshire from about 1695. In 1698, the company was already involved in disputes with the Grosvenor estate over mining on Old Rake, Halkyn, one of the richest veins on the mountain. Rich ore was being wound up in baskets at Old Rake and Long Rake, where by 1701 the company had a building which included a smithy, count-house, storeroom for ore, lodgings for its agent and a chimney for the convenience of the miners in winter. The Quaker Company were clearly responsible for the introduction of a more methodical approach to mining on the mountain; ore dressing was being undertaken at the mine, the processed ore being transported by cart to its new smelting-house 2–3km away, at the foot of the mountain at Gadlys, near Bagillt, which was in production by 1704.

Until the invention of the steam engine the raising of ore had been by simple methods such as rope and bucket, windlasses and later by horse whims. Consequently, shafts remained fairly shallow, generally in the form of bell-pits not exceeding 10m in depth. The Quaker Company were responsible for introducing several technological innovations such as a windmill for pumping out water and winding ore at Pant-y-pwll-dwr Rake, followed by a later installation of an engine house for a Newcomen steam engine by 1729, one of the first of seven to be installed by the company on Halkyn. The Quaker interests on Halkyn included Maeslygan, Old Rake, Long Rake, Silver Rake and Moel-y-crio and shafts up to about 60 yards in depth were sunk by 1720s. Another innovation introduced by the company was the use of adits which served as drainage and access levels. Previously, a majority of mines would have been under water and unworkable during the winter months. These improvements enabled mining to take place all year round as well as the exploitation of deeper, richer veins. By the end of the 18th century most of the richest veins on Halkyn Mountain were already being worked, and further expansion necessitated deeper workings along these lodes.

Other factors which gave rise the increased scale of mining during the early 18th century and beyond were the abundance of coal in Flintshire and the development of its use as a replacement for charcoal in smelting lead and as fuel for the steam engines. The proximity of the Dee estuary also made the task of shipping ore to manufacturing centres and smelteries elsewhere along the coast much easier. One of the drawbacks was the shortage of water power which had been such a boon in other mining areas and because of this a great dependence was placed on coal-fired steam-engines as a source of power for most mines in the area during the 19th century.

The gradual expansion of the industry and the need for higher levels of capital investment led to the replacement of small mining ventures by large-scale mining companies during the course of the 19th century. By the late 19th century Flintshire as a whole became the most productive mining area in Wales, and second only in importance to the Pennines in Britain. Earlier workings had exhausted the more easily worked sources of ore. Deeper mining required more capital investment, particularly for drainage which became increasingly essential as workings sank further below the water-table. A number of smaller drainage adits were dug by individual companies, but two major drainage tunnels were cut through the mountain as part of a co-operative venture. The Halkyn Deep Level Tunnel was driven initially by the Grosvenor Estate in 1818, and taken over by the Halkyn District Mines Drainage Company in 1875. It drained the mines on the south-east side of the mountain, such as New North Halkyn and Mount Halkyn, before continuing south towards Hendre and Llyn-y-pandy. In 1897 a group of companies formed the Holywell-Halkyn Mining and Tunnel Company and began to drive the Milwr Tunnel from the Dee Estuary at Bagillt. It cut across the centre of the orefield from north to south, and was eventually extended to the Mold Mines in 1957. By these means, all the earlier mines which worked the mineral veins along the course of the tunnel could to be re-worked to greater and greater depths, and up to 800ft deep in the case of the Halkyn mines. Other improvements in mining technique during the 19th century included the invention of the rock drill, the use of compressed air underground, and the use of dynamite.

Documentary evidence is often slight, and it is only in rare instances that detailed records and plans of the mining sites survive. Often, the only documentary reference of the almost 100 mines in the historic landscape area, with name such as Dog Pit, Prince Patrick, Queen of the Mountain, or True Blue, is a note in the Mining Journal relating to production figures, changes in ownership, and occasionally the installation of new equipment, and returns for the production of lead recorded by the Mining Record Office from 1845. In some instances there are reports by the agents which can give a valuable insight into the workings at a particular date. Although company records survive for many of the mines, they are frequently incomplete and are difficult to relate to what is still visible on the ground. Mine plans and sections of the workings have sometimes survived, but they often only relate to underground workings, and contain little or no indication of what lay above ground. For many sites the earliest surviving surface plans are provided by the 1st edition of the Ordnance Survey, generally of the 1880s. The surface workings and structures were occasionally recorded in contemporary photographs, although sadly such records are very scarce. Despite the relatively recent date of many mines, the interpretation of the surviving field evidence is of critical importance to our understanding of the mining and processing techniques that were employed at different periods.

There were peaks in production around 1850 and 1895. The end of the 19th century saw a decline in the mining industry due to competition from abroad. During the First World War, the Ministry of Munitions provided loans to stimulate the industry. In 1913, the Holywell-Halkyn Mining and Tunnel Company began to extend the Sea Level Tunnel. Drainage and Mining interests were amalgamated in 1928, when the Halkyn District United Mines extended the Sea Level Tunnel southwards and opened up new veins. The tunnel served an underground railway system using battery locomotives for the carriage of ore and personnel. The 20th century surface operations were powered by electricity. Mining was suspended during the Second World War, but subsequently recommenced with a number of concerns which combined the mining of lead ore with the quarrying of limestone for agricultural purposes. The large-scale operations of the Halkyn District United Mines (the amalgamation of nine former mining companies) were centred around the Pen-y-bryn Shaft on Halkyn Mountain. Small-scale mining operations continued until the 1970s, the head frame at Pen-y-bryn being finally dismantled in 1987.

Although many of the sites remain relatively well preserved in the unimproved core areas of this landscape, some sites have been lost to more recent limestone quarrying and landscaping for agricultural and residential use, particularly around the periphery. Mine sites immediately north of Brynford have been landscaped for use by Holywell Golf Course, and the construction of the A55 trunk road cut through many of the mine sites further north, particularly in the area of Smithy Gate. In the area around Pen-y-ball Top only part of the early mining remains have survived as a result of reclamation for agricultural use. In places only the larger shafts and surrounding spoil tips remain, together with the earthwork remains of tramways belonging to The Grange and Coetia Butler Quarries. Numerous shafts were capped in concrete for reasons of safety as part of a programme undertaken by Clwyd County Council in the 1970s. Derelict land reclamation schemes involving shaft capping, infilling and disposal of large-scale waste, have levelled much of the late 20th century workings, particularly in the area to the south-west of Halkyn village, which included workings of Halkyn District United Mines on the Pant-y-go vein. Further schemes resulted in the loss of the Prince Patrick Mine to the Pant-y-pwll-dwr Quarry and some of the workings on the Pant-y-pydew vein to the Pen yr Henblas Chert Quarry.

The most plentiful surviving surface evidence of mining are the ubiquitous mine shafts and trial pits which appear in clusters and chains along the mineral veins, of which about 4,700 are recorded along Halkyn Mountain, with a fewer number of deeper shafts scattered across the hill. Though some of the shallower shafts and trials are still open, many have collapsed and are simply represented by depressions. The original depth of the shafts is indicated by the amount of spoil which appear as chains of smaller heaps, ring-like mounds around the mouth of the shaft, or as large consolidated mounds. Most of the later deeper shafts, dug for access, drainage or ventilation, are now mostly capped in stone or concrete.

Few mine buildings or other above-ground structures have survived, as a result of natural decay as well as a deliberate policy of clearing away derelict buildings. Parts of one or two original stone engine houses survive, as at Glan Nant, near Holway, last used as a pigsty, and possibly at Halkyn, together with a former chimney base. Traces of a possible stone-faced winding wheelpit also survive at Holway. Former mine offices or manager's houses now converted to dwellings survive at Parry's Mine, west of Pentre Halkyn, and Clwt Militia Mine, north of Calcoed. Several original smithies survive, as at the former Glan Nant, Carmel, Ty Newydd and Mona mines, now converted to other uses. Other surface structures shown on earlier maps of which there is now no visible trace include winding gear, powder magazines, and sawpits, though a small number of horse whim sites are still identifiable, including one at Rhes-y-cae, visible as a circle about 13.5m in diameter. Numerous reservoirs, leats, and tramways are also shown on earlier maps, some of which can still be clearly identified in amongst the mine shafts. Limestone boundary stones up to about 1m high have survived here and there, which marked out different mining concessions, the positioning of boundary markers having been frequent subject of dispute between the Grosvenor Estate and the crown agents in the second half of the 19th century. Much of the ore processing appears to have been carried out away from the mountain, but areas of dressing floor waste and sunken areas probably representing buddles survive at Holway. Early smelting sites on the mountain are unknown, but are indicated by the place-name element 'ball', as in Coitia Ball and Pen-y-ball Top, derived from the word bole.

Other significant industrial activity within the historic landscape area have included quarrying for chert, 'marble', hydraulic lime, limestone for building and agricultural lime, each of which have also left an indelible marks on the landscape, often in close proximity to each other and to the remains of lead mining. Chert for grinding and for the production of stoneware and porcelain for the Minton and Wedgwood factories in the Potteries was being quarried between the 1770s and the early 20th century at Pant-y-pwll-dwr, Pen yr Henblas, Pen-yr-garreg, Pen-yr-hwylfa, Bryn Mawr and on the north side of Moel y Gaer. Halkyn Marble was quarried at Pant-y-pwll-dwr from the 1830s and exported to the surrounding region. Hydraulic lime that would set below water was also produced at The Grange, Holway and at Pant-y-pydew between the 1830s and 1890s, being in demand for the construction of the new docks being built in Liverpool, Birkenhead and Belfast. Limestone for building, gravestones and gateposts and lime-burning was quarried at a number of centres, notably again at Pant-y-pwll-dwr and between Halkyn and Rhes-y-cae. Many former limekilns are known from early maps of plans though some of these, as at Pen-y-parc, Bryn Rodyn, and Billins no longer survive. Other limekilns survive only as foundations or low mounds, though well-preserved kilns are known at Carmel and Chwarel-wen, with a block of five kilns at Pant-y-pydew.

Deposits of glacial clay and sand were also being quarried, particularly towards the southern end of the area. Clay suitable for the production of porcelain was being dug from quarries at Foelddu, between Halkyn and Rhes-y-cae, between the 1820s and 1890s. Clay pits and a brick kiln were set up at Waen-y-trochwaed, west of Rhes-y-cae, in the late 19th century. A glacial esker was extensively quarried for sand at Moel-y-crio in the first few decades of the 20th century.

Stone quarrying continues to the present day, with several of the larger quarries, now several hundred feet deep, and impacting upon the surrounding landscape.

Defensive and military landscapes

The major defensive earthwork in the historic landscape area is the substantial late prehistoric hillfort at Moel y Gaer, Rhosesmor, extensively excavated in the 1970s, prior to the construction of a reservoir. The hillfort was occupied, perhaps discontinuously, between about the late 7th century BC until some time prior to the Roman conquest. In an earlier phase a settlement of substantial timber roundhouses was defended by a timber palisade. The defences were subsequently replaced by a ditch and rampart of stone and earth, in this instance protecting a settlement of stake-walled roundhouses with numerous rectangular structures with four large posts, possibly representing raised buildings for storing grain. Few other defensive or military works are known in the area.

Funerary, ecclesiastical and ornamental landscapes

Prehistoric ceremonial and funerary activity in the area is probably represented by a number of Bronze Age round barrows. Because of the extent of mining in the area these are sometimes difficult to distinguish from later spoil tips, though there are pairs of monuments at Eosfan on Holywell Common, and at Parc-y-prysau, west of Pentre Halkyn which appear to be genuine. Bronze Age finds including faience glass beads and a cinerary urn from a barrow at Clwt Militia to the north-west of Brynford which has now been destroyed.

During the middle ages the area was divided between the ecclesiastical parishes of Whitford, Holywell, Northop, Halkyn, Cilcain and Ysgeifiog, three new ecclesiastical parishes being created in the middle of the 19th century, Gorsedd from Whitford and Ysgeifiog in 1853, Brynford from Holywell and Ysgeifiog in 1853, and Rhes-y-cae from the parishes of Halkyn, Cilcain and Ysgeifiog in 1848, as a result of the rapidly expanding population and competition with the nonconformists and the transference to Rome of the newly-built church at Pantasaph. St Paul's Church Gorsedd was built in 1852–53, St Michael's Church, Brynford in 1851–53 and its associated rectory in 1857, and Christ Church, Rhes-y-cae was built in 1847, and its parsonage in 1859.

The 19th century saw the rise of four nonconformist groups within the area, the Independents, Baptists and Wesleyan and Calvinistic Methodists, who competed with each other and the established church, with chapels built and in many instances rebuilt at Rhes-y-cae and Pentre Halkyn, which each had two chapels, and at Pant-y-go and Brynford.

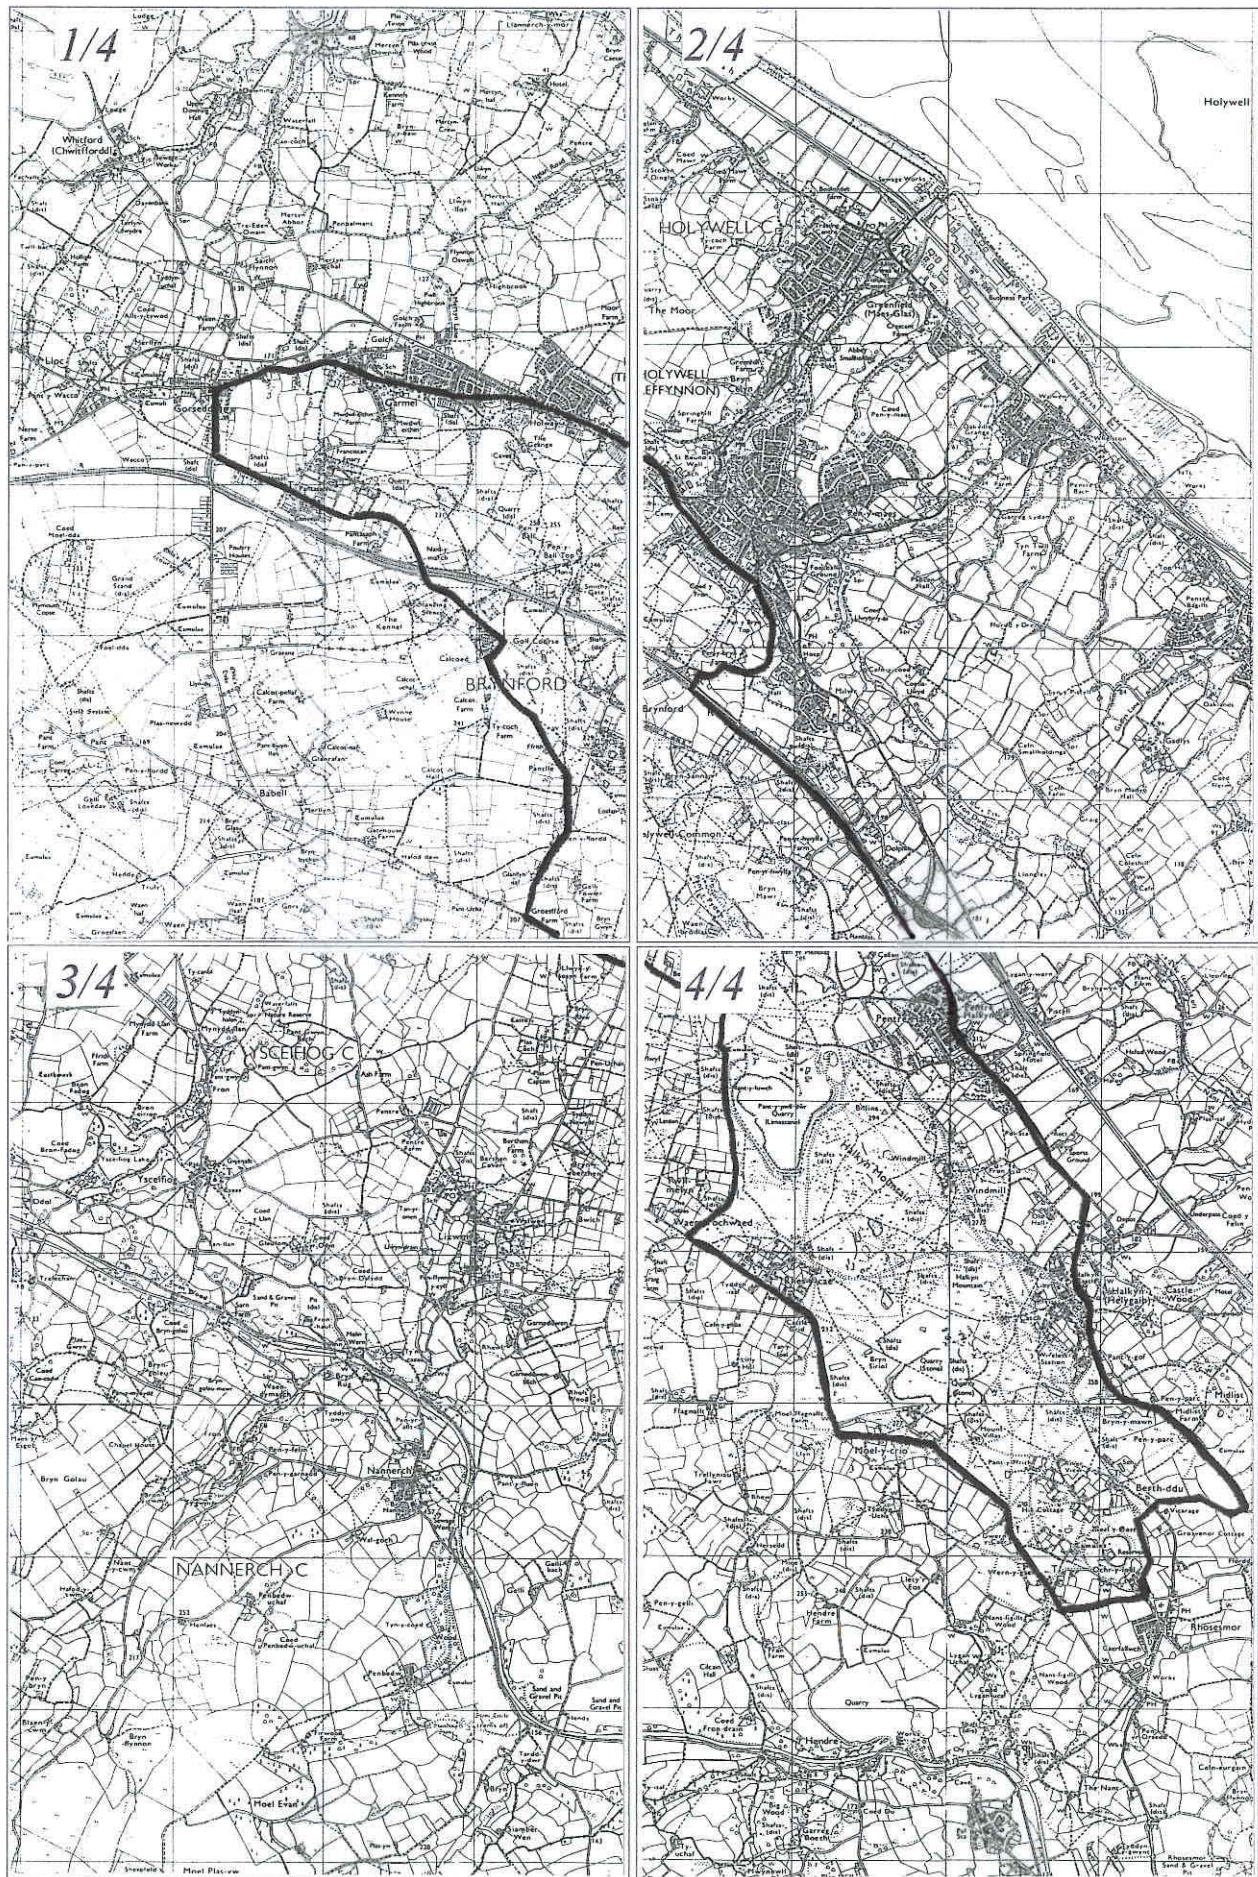

The northern part of the historic landscape area, within the parish of Holywell, was in possession of the Cistercian abbey at Basingwerk, established by the mid 12th century, who established a monastic grange at The Grange, west of Holywell, which came into private hands 'in consideration of purchase money' following dissolution of the abbey in 1537.

The complex of religious buildings built in gothic style at the Franciscan Friary at Pantasaph, including St Davids's Church, dates largely to the period 1849–79, and was built on the estate of the earl of Denbigh. The now ruined convent of St Clare's, to the south, is also of this period. The associated gardens on sloping ground behind the friary, constructed in the 1870s, with calvary and gothic chapels marking the Stations of the Cross are included within the Historic Gardens Register.

Key historic landscape management issues

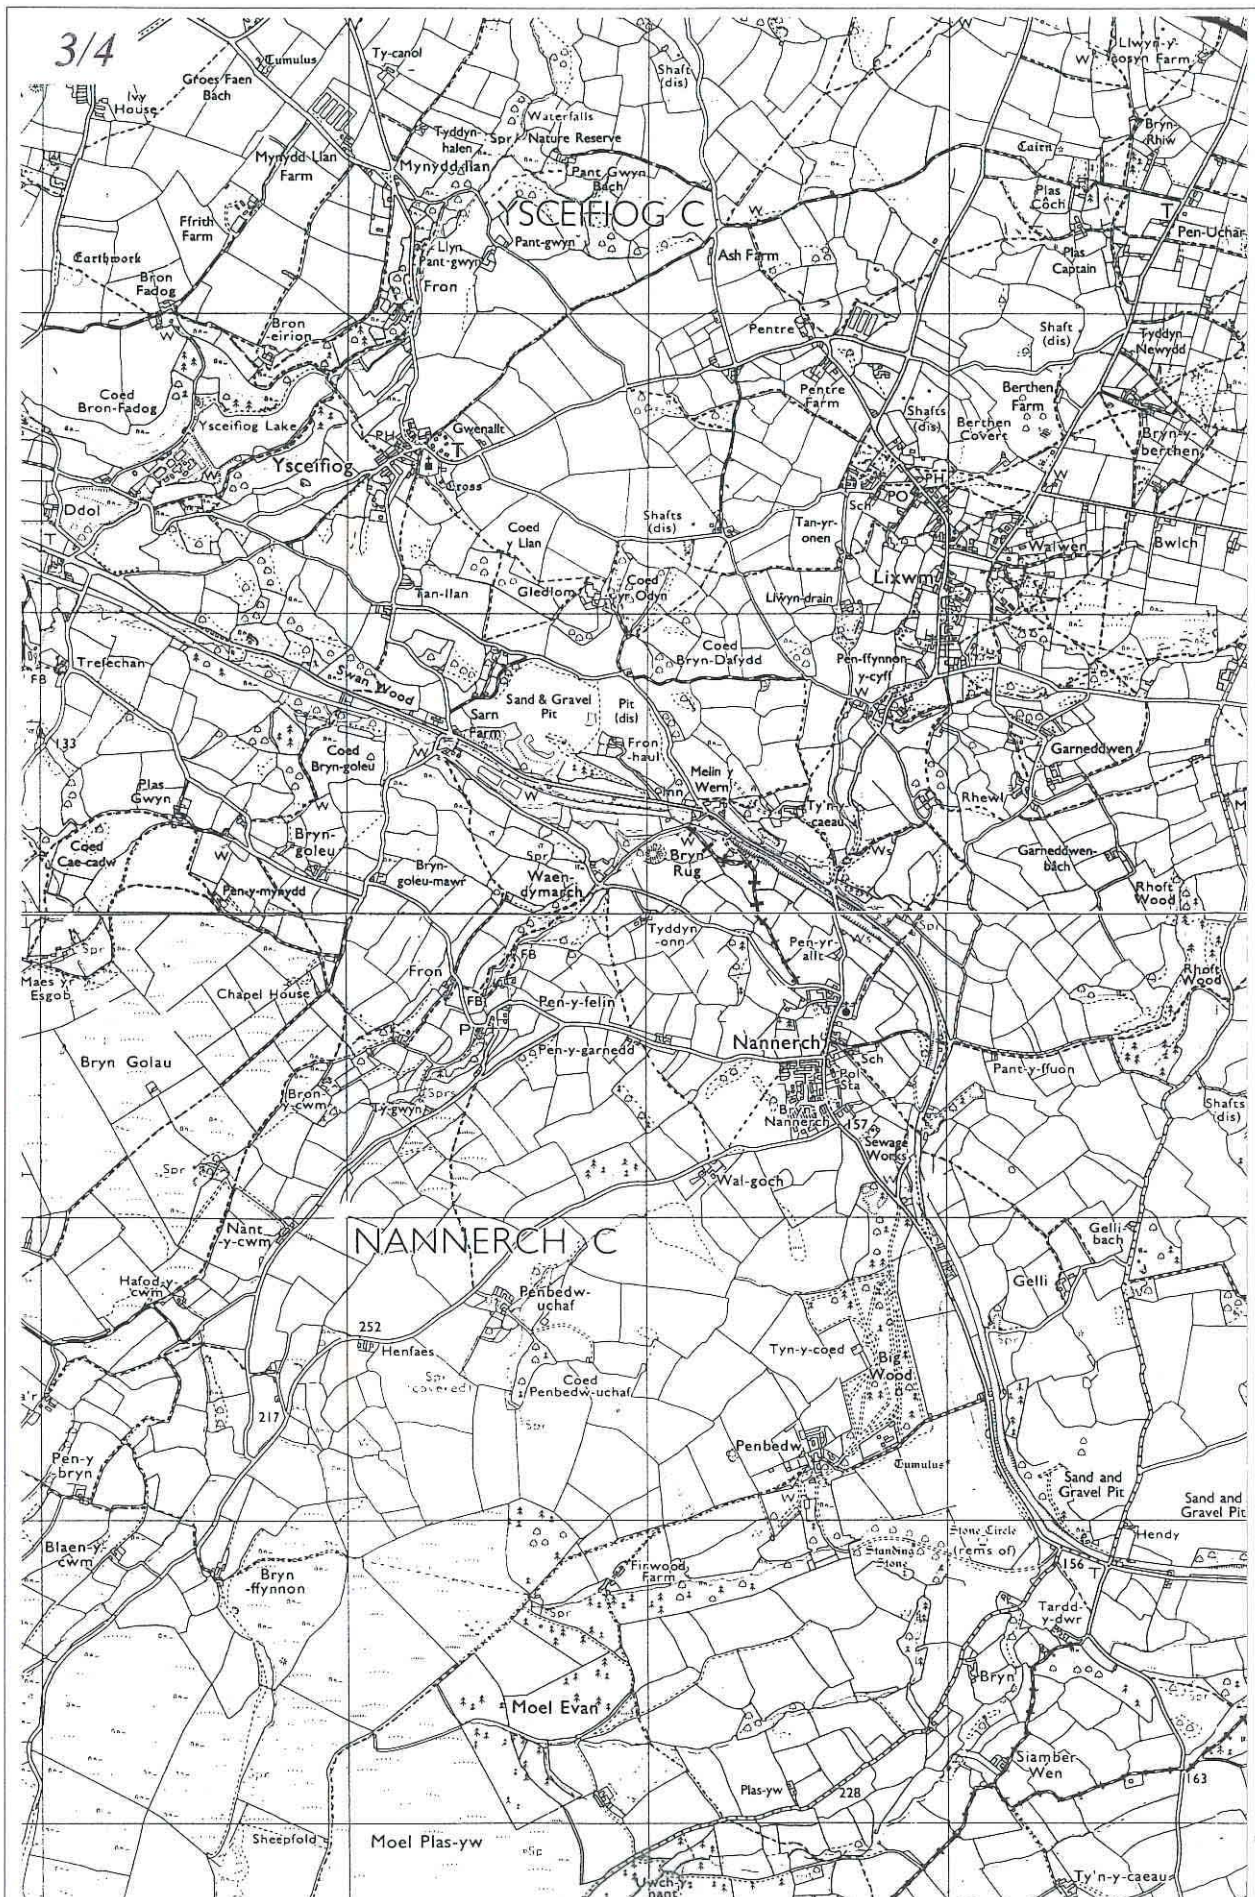

Holywell Common and Halkyn Mountain is an extensive and highly distinctive mining landscape predominantly of 18th and 19th-century date, unparalleled elsewhere in Wales. Past and continuing threats to the archaeological heritage of the landscape area have included field clearance and pasture improvement, derelict land reclamation schemes, road improvement schemes, housing development, stone quarrying, and shaft capping, particularly when these works have been undertaken without proper consultation or archaeological advice. The landscape is deserving of a detailed conservation strategy and plan, which should take the following conservation and management issues into account.

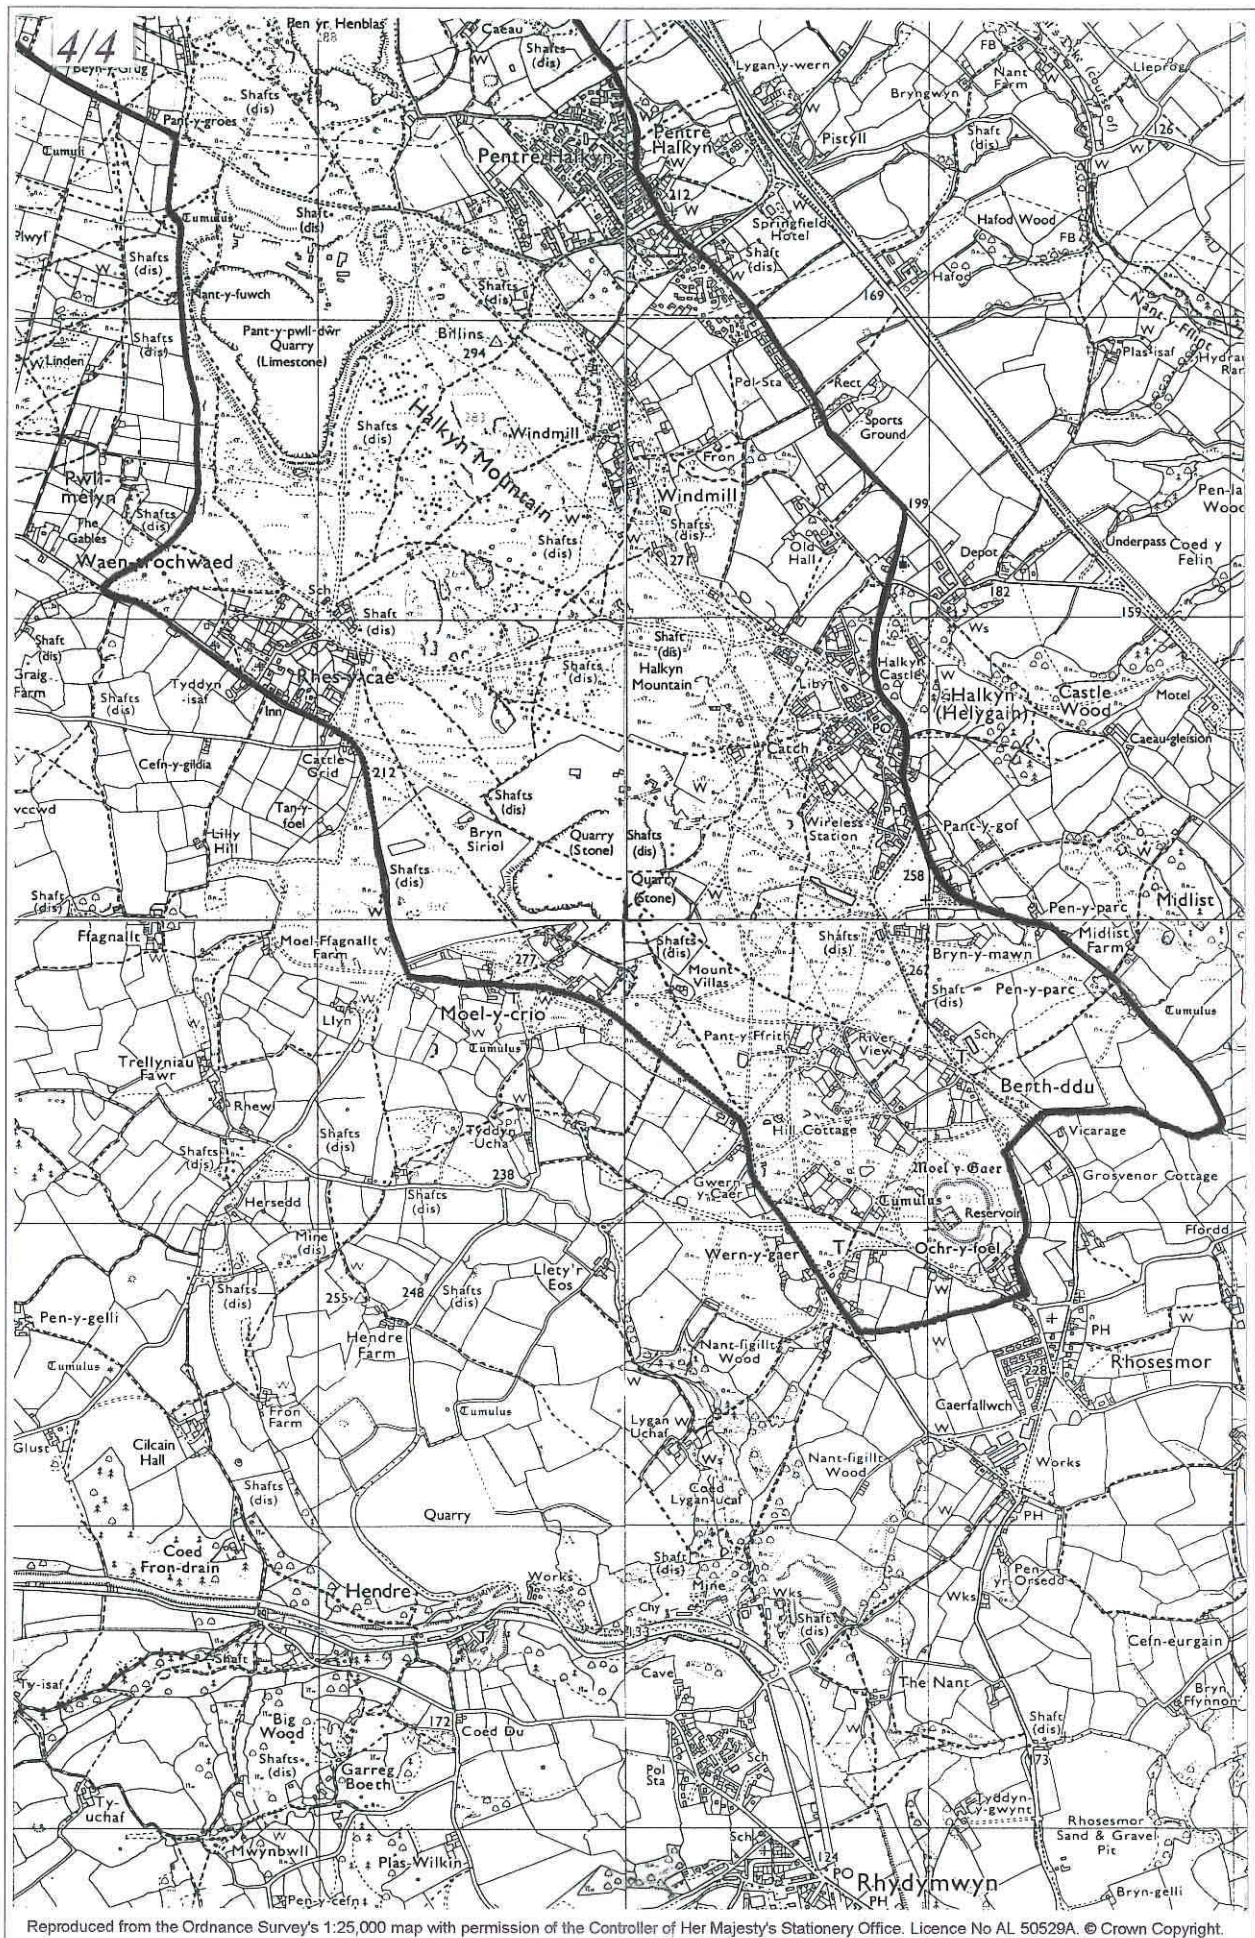

- prehistoric earthwork sites, including round barrows, enclosure and roundhouse sites and hillfort
- surviving areas of early surface workings including open-cuts, bell-pits, shallow shafts, trial and associated waste heaps.
- remains of processing, transport and power infrastructure, tramways, leats, reservoirs, processing areas, horse whim sites, processing areas
- mine buildings, smithies, mine cottages, mine offices and managers' houses, remains of engine houses, wheel-pits, workers' housing
- limekilns and early stone quarries
